THURSDAY, MARCH 7, 1929

Surely the bitterness of the Civil War has passed when the Senate of West Virginia has gone on record in favor of granting pensions to Confederate soldiers who are citizens of this State.

Governor White has had a long and distinguished career in West Virginia. He was born in Ohio, educated at Marietta College, and came to West Virginia when he was twenty-five years old.

He is a philosopher and savant and is perhaps the most scholarly man who has ever ascended to the mountain tops of politics in West Virginia, and though he may have found them wrapped in clouds and snow, he has known what it is to look down upon the hate of those below.

My earliest recollection of him however, is that of a man in his thirties, full of hot sand and ginger, taking the head of every table he happened the moment to be by sheer force and animation. The first glimpse I had of him was in the year of 1861, when he had remained with me upwards of forty years. It exemplifies the adage: Take a look at a man the first time you see him for you will never see him again.

Later they made him governor of West Virginia and he has been in the pitiless light that beats upon a public man for nearly fifty years. He has come through with honor. His olive branch to the Southern soldier is the most gracious act of West Virginia politics. It is highly appreciated. We cherish his dictum that the Southern soldiers have made good citizens in West Virginia.

Governor White was elected to the governorship in 1900. He is one of the many publishers and writers and printers who have been elected to that place in my recollection. Mention is made here of MacCorkle, Atkinson, White, Dawson, Cornwell, and Conley. Writers cover the field.

The barbarian rule was woe to the vanquished. This was exemplified to a certain extent in the pioneer plan that the only good Indian was a dead one. But since the War of the Roses it has been possible to carry out the Biblical injunction to esteem the noble adversary. This more than anything else has made the world a comparatively safe place to live in.

There is a great deal of cordiality among the soldiers of the Civil War as with the rank and file of the Confederates, and as for the commissioned officers nothing was too good an officer that they captured, it was not until after the war closed and when so many uplifters who were non-combatants volunteered to show the Southerners how to work that there was friction between the north and the south.

The first year of the war there was a regiment of Georgia soldiers in camp at Marlinton, and there was a great deal of sickness, typhoid fever and measles. A large number of the soldiers died.

A young Georgian by the name of Franklin Wellingham took the fever and his brother was with him. To get him away from the deadly camp life, they went to see Daniel Kellison, a Union man, who lived in a beautiful blue-grass glen, about four miles away, on the Dry Run, a branch of Swago Creek. This farm is now occupied by his grandson, Porter Kellison. They took the sick man up at the farm and nursed him until he died. In the meantime the regiment moved away and the brother went with it, but before he left he handed Daniel Kellison a twenty dollar gold piece. A soldier was left to look after the sick man and after some weeks young Wellingham died and he was buried in the community burying ground and his grave has been cared for ever since.

Clark Kellison, a son of Daniel Kellison, was a Union soldier, and he came home on a furlough while the sick soldier was there, and they became great friends and some other young Union soldiers gathered around. After the funeral, the Union soldiers very considerably agreed to deliver the surviving soldier to the Union authorities, where he was kept out of danger.

who had accumulated property held it under State law, and they were impelled by threats of confiscation of their property to choose quickly for the comfort and safety of their families and were lined up on the Southern side much against their inclination and better judgment in many instances. The Whigs mostly went to the South and the Democrats mostly joined the North, but in many families there were soldiers on both sides of the controversy.

In the spring of 1864, the Tenth West Virginia Regiment made a scout through Pocahontas County and took a number of Confederate soldiers who were home on a furlough. This was in the month of May. They got back to their base of supplies at Beverly with 36 prisoners, 85 horses, and 40 head of cattle. Among the prisoners was my uncle, James Henry Price. In the Tenth, he had many friends, but he had been raised with the prisoners. He was with the Union soldiers. A number of the Union soldiers went into conference with James Henry Price with the intention of converting him to the Union cause and saving him from prison. But he would not consent to this. He said to them: "Nobody know how long this war is going to last, or which side is going to win. I think the safest thing that I can do is to come out on the same side I went in on."

So he went on to Camp Chase where he remained until the end of the war, and walked home, subsisting for food on the kindness of the Union people along the road. For all the hundreds of miles that he walked, it was not until he got home that he was into a Confederate community. Man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn, is the conclusion reached by Robert Burns in his dirge entitled, Man was Made to Mourn. He reaches the conclusion that there is some recompense for the poor and the oppressed in that they are glad enough to die, while the more comfortable are unwilling to quit.

Under the American scheme of government, it is customary to rule by kindness. The iron hand in the velvet glove. Without the consent of the governed the country would not last very long. The real hate is found within the faction and that was true in the Civil War to a remarkable degree. Note the daily hate that was voiced by West and Floyd, two Confederate generals who were jealous of each other. This was reviewed at considerable length the other day.

The case of the arrest of Captain Roemer at White Sulphur Springs in the late summer of 1861, is a case in point, and is left the gallant captain enraged and bewildered. Wise was protecting the cliff known as Hawks Nest from capture, and Floyd was marching to and fro with the Union armies closing on several sides. Both the Confederate generals had been calling for supplies ranging from shoe strings to rifled cannon, and wagons were wallowing through the mud between the supply depot at Jackson River and Sewell Mountain on the old James River and Kanawha Turnpike.

Wise has sent Captain Roemer of his artillery forces to get some of the big field pieces. The Virginia Central railroad, now the C. & O. had been built to a point near where Low Moor stands, and the supplies were loaded into wagons there and hauled over Allegheny Mountain to the western valleys.

Wise's artillery had not come, but the Captain found one big six pounder there of the new rifled type addressed to Gen. Floyd, and as he had horses to haul cannon, he proceeded to take possession of the cannon and transported it some thirty miles towards Gen. Floyd's command and had got it as far as White Sulphur Springs, when a lieutenant met him with a squad of men and arrested him for stealing a cannon. Roemer tried to make Floyd see that the cannon was being brought in the right direction, but to no avail. Floyd wrote to Wise for a full list of officers as he wanted a court-martial to try Roemer for stealing a gun. Then Wise blew up in his daily fashion.

The matter was laid before R. E. Lee and no doubt he smoothed it over for there seems to have been no trial and in a few days Wise went home and the mountains saw him no more. His last stand was on top of Big Sewell Mountain, called Camp Delancey. It was made in open opposition to Floyd's orders, and it will never be known who he was defying, Floyd or Rosecrans. Rosecrans took his position on the heights just west of Big Sewell, and the armies faced each other for some days. One day in the Wise Legion, the officer of the day came on to take charge, and not knowing what officer he was to relieve, went to headquarters, and there was no one there to inform him. A drummer suggested that if they beat the drum, the officer would appear, no doubt, so they decided between them to beat the Long Roll, the signal to repel an attack and engage in battle. It brought the camp into an uproar in a minute and also had the effect of producing the officer of the day.

Wise to Floyd: Why did you take fifty-four of my sabres? Wise to R. E. Lee: I have not been treated with respect by General Floyd and co-operation with him will be difficult and disagreeable, if not impossible.

possible. Floyd to Wise: You are hereby peremptorily ordered. This continued until Wise was recalled to Richmond but by that time, West Virginia had been lost to the Confederate States, and from that time the people of the mountains held the balance of power in the conflict that lasted four years. The time has come when it is proper to review the action of the mountain people in forming a new state and saving the Union. We hear a good deal about research work by the educational institutions of West Virginia, but they do not seem to be concerned with the history of West Virginia, which should be the matter of the first and highest importance.

But I want to turn this conversation in the direction of our duty to our neighbor. It has been suggested that when the Levites were walking along the road and saw the body of the man who had fallen among thieves, that they did not go to his relief because they thought it was a summer boarder who was born to be robbed, and that after the good Samaritan had bound up the wounds, that they regretted having missed the opportunity of helping a travelling man from Joppa.

In the old logging days it is related that when they were prodding a big run of logs out of Millington Creek in the time of flood, that one big man had fallen into the cold, winter stream and was barely keeping his head above water, and unable to move, when a logger came by and saw who it was in the stream. Quoth he: "If it was not my dinner time, I would help you out," and went on and left him.

Another good Samaritan came by and reached in a pole to the drowning man and pulled him ashore. After the Civil War was over, the soldiers of the South, were about as poor as ever it was possible for men to be. But they went to work. They were too hungry and miserable to do anything else. Like the man that was too sick to stay in bed. And they are right who say that they made good citizens. There never was a case in which submission without even mental reservations was more needed for the restoration of the country. With the splendid spar of poverty, they worked and saved and managed and the time came when they were the most important and influential citizens of the conquered states. And they consented to be governed. There can be no government without obedience.

That is one thing that causes men to cast troubled glances at conditions in some of the great northern cities like Chicago, where some of the laws seem to lack the sanction of the people, and where any day there may be a serious revolt not unlike a civil war. It is hard to tell what to do. We hear churches being accused of trying to fill the jails. Instead of this. We hear the preachers are not sure of an audience unless they get them penned up behind iron bars. We hear that if the church people would cease to boogie that the problem would be much easier. We hear that the young people instead of growing in grace are following up old timers and yielding to curiosity and getting drunk.

The other day I was invited to set in a case of youthful delinquency. I walked into the sheriff's office and there were two under detention. One was a remarkable neat and clean looking Austrian laborer. He looked like a priest. It seems that he knelt down in a barber shop and prayed. Presently making a shrine out of the sheriff's desk he spread a clean white handkerchief on the floor, and knelt down and lifted up his head and clasped his hands and maintained a posture of silent prayer for some minutes and got up. He looked intelligent and opened not his mouth. So they sent him to the asylum for the insane where he can pray in peace.

The other was a little flapper lady who is just about fourteen and who insisted on her constitutional right to go on automobile parties in the night time without her parents' consent. It is a problem that came in with the ford. The family sits around the fire of a winter evening. The supper is over and the dishes put away. The picture of peace and contentment is perfect. And then in a twinkling of the eye, the devil is to pay. From the highway, some six hundred feet an automobile horn blares forth its sinful sound. Siren is a good word for it. That horn breaks up that family nest as surely as if some one dynamited the house. The eternal conflict between father and mother on one side and the big girls on the other begins again. And the girls walk out to join the party over the protest of their helpless parents. Parents have been weighed and found wanting by the bright high school minds of today. In this case, the parents decided that it was better to send the girl to the reform school, a kind of high toned penitentiary, than to keep her at home and at the little cross roads school. And so it was decided, but the father took the child back home for two weeks to see if the court house experience would bring obedience. The child seemed normal except that she showed signs of being in love with one particular youth, and love grows on opposition.

It was said in her presence, that under the law, the young man who blew the horn and took out girls from their home without the consent of the parents, was guilty of a very grave offense for contributing to youthful delinquency, and that he could be fined and imprisoned. Then the little girl spoke up: "Would it be all right if he did not blow the horn?"

Its all a muddle. It is a relief to turn from the confusion of a crowded world, to the effort to do kindness to the noble Rebels, before we all stand presently at God's great judgment seat.
